Brief Outline of The Talk

Being a service economy without any major energy-intensive industries, buildings account for some 89% of the electricity consumed in Hong Kong. Reducing the level of electricity consumed for operation of buildings is crucial to reducing our greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions.

The first carbon audit guidelines for conducting carbon audits on buildings in Hong Kong were officially launched in July 2008 to assist the users and managers of buildings in enhancing their awareness of GHG emissions, measuring GHG emission performance of their buildings and actively participating in the emission reduction campaign.

A number of organizations have taken the lead to undertake or assist in conducting carbon audits on their buildings and to initiate carbon reduction programmes.

The Environment and Conservation Fund has reserved $150 million to provide subsidies to eligible applicants for conducting energy-cum-carbon audits and $300 million for carrying out energy efficiency improvement projects in buildings.
